At only 40, and a Lieutenant Colonel in the U.S. Air Force, Earl Scott had been a fitness buff his entire life. In November 2007, he noticed shortness of breath and his wife urged him to get a physical. Scott recalls, "The tests came back negative and after I started taking aspirin on a regular basis, the symptoms went away. So I wasn't worried." In April 2008, the symptoms returned but more severe. Test results at the Travis Air Force Base ER, indicated he had suffered a mild heart attack. He was transferred to the Queen of the Valley Medical Center, for more tests. At the Queen, a plaque deposit was found in Scott's anterior descending coronary artery. He was scheduled for a robotically assisted coronary artery bypass graft (CABG), to reopen the blood vessel. "I was glad I qualified for the minimally invasive procedure," Scott says. He recalls, "I spent one night in the hospital. The next morning all the tubes and wires were removed and by noon I was up and walking around. I was back to moderate exercise in a few weeks and in a few months I was back to work and my normal workout routine."
